

Divorce Resource Centre of Colorado Explores Options for Divorcing During Uncertain Economic Times

Depressed Economy Keeps Together What Divorce Can Put Asunder

Nationwide, professionals such as marriage counselors, certified divorce financial analysts and divorce lawyers report a trend that has a lot to do with the current economic woes.

Many distressed couples are putting off divorce because the cost of splitting up is prohibitive. Tough times can make couples more financially dependent on each other, which could keep unhappy couples together.

The evidence of divorce decline is primarily anecdotal, because 2008 national divorce statistics aren't yet available. But in some jurisdictions that report semi-annually, the trend is being borne out.

Trend Hits Closer To Home

"It appears to be the case in this area too," states Denisa Tova, a Colorado Springs based Certified Divorce Financial Analyst (CDFA) and founding partner in the Divorce Resource Centre of Colorado. "As a financial advisor for a local TV station I receive questions from viewers about this subject." She also sees it in her practice. "The economic stress adds fuel to an already emotionally difficult situation such as divorce."

Explore Your Options

The double whammy of limitations imposed on cash flow and the declining value of investments necessitate creative solutions. A CDFA can point out options that might never have occurred to you, and save you money in the long run.

Colorado can help you make informed financial choices about key issues such as: choosing the divorce option (and cost) that fit best for you, if you can afford to keep your marital house, and how to balance a parenting plan with your work life. Denisa works closely with clients to create a sound, forward-looking spending plan, and to illustrate how various settlement options would affect you and your family in 5, 10, or 20 years. It is often through the thorough exploration of if/then financial scenarios that equitable solutions are discovered. Denisa Tova has been providing expert financial advice to pre and post divorce clients for over 10 years as a CDFA and Certified Financial Planner. She is also an experienced Mediator. Her mission is to empower clients in each and every step of their journey through the difficult life transition of divorce, and beyond.
